Soviets Hunt Fake Spy's Mythical U.S. Agents

NEW YORK — The life of a "spy who refuses to spy," is a nightmare of fear, fear of a blunder that will bring the secret police on your neck.

It was the life I lived in spring of 1961.

I had become involved in the cloak-and-dagger war between East and West while preparing a singing engagement at the State Opera House in the Soviet sector of Berlin.

American intelligence officers asked me to report on Russians I met there. But they washed their hands of me when the Communists asked me to work for them.

The Soviet KGB — state security service — was more persistent. And because I did not want to give up my big singing chance I strung them along with false information.

MOTHER THREATENED

But then Evgeni Khedrov — in reality Colonel Evgeni A. Zastrovstsev of the Red intelligence service — offered me money for my services, and when I refused he threatened the safety of my mother, a doctor in New York.

In my frantic efforts to get out I told them I was being questioned by "Mr. Smith," a fictitious U.S. "intelligence officer." With the CIA interested in me, surely Khedrov would have no further use for me.

It was a big mistake. "Make him interested in you," said Khedrov. "With your contacts in East Berlin, I'm sure he'll want to recruit you."

I reported Smith had fallen for his ruse. The KGB man handed me a tiny camera, sewn into the corner of a soiled handkerchief. Urging "extreme caution," he told me to "photograph any papers of importance" I could find at Smith's office.

But what papers of importance could I copy? I realized that I had to manufacture my own "secret documents."

Having been a secretary for the U.S. Army in the early '50s, I knew what files in government offices looked like. I bought a box of government-size, standard file cards. I persuaded the owners of several passport-photo shops to sell me old "mug shots" which had never been picked up. Then I invented "cover names," "areas of operations," and other cryptic data, which I typed on the cards.

16 FAKE CARDS

Whenever "hard" facts were needed, I filled in: "Refer to '201-file,' the term used in all U.S. government offices for personnel reference index. On the back of the cards, I noted "payments," giving the name of West Berlin banks, and rubber-stamping on dates. Then I pasted on the photos.

I manufactured 16 cards of "Mr. Smith's contact file." The "agents" listed on them "operated" all over East Germany, in Czechoslovakia and Poland. Two of them I described as "working inside the Soviet Union."

I photographed one of the cards and took the film to Khedrov. From his excitement at our next meeting, I knew KGB wires were humming all over eastern Europe in an effort to track down my "paper agents."

Now they trusted me. I had penetrated the Soviet intelligence net in Germany.

I was a frequent visitor to Karlshorst, the Soviet headquarters compound. I could enter the intelligence compound almost at will. I attended frequent parties. One of Khedrov's friends, a major named Kolya Polayet, had a crush on me and showered me with gifts.
